"There is no human situation so miserable that it cannot be made worse by the presence of a policeman."
Brendan Behan

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

Before I took two months off, to come to Belfast to work on my photographic project on divided societies – which of course was nowhere near finish after the two months, in fact, I'm still here – I've spent a lot of time reading. I lowed the dunders to the library through my early Eurovision, drunk my way through an undergrowth levels of the old building and walking through endless corridors of shelves full of books. Politics, history, military, art, literature, law, anything broadening my mind regarding Irish complexities was welcome. The history of Ireland is primarily a history of exploitation, famine, migration, and demands for independence. After so many dives into stories of colonialism, miscarriages of justice, doomed bin ties and human profiteering, I subconsciously read my way into the literary section, though ignoring Ulysses and Finnegans Wake, straight into crime fiction's haven. Predictably mustering on an even deeper subconscious level Walter Benjamin's

"No matter what trail the flaneur may follow, every one of them will lead him to a crime."

When I walk into ULLIE on Botanic Avenue – THE bookshop for crime fiction, THE bookshop for inspiration, one of the few survivors in this neoliberal rage against small business and independent thinking – I can choose from a wide range of award winning local crime fiction writers. That hasn't always been the case. For a long time crime fiction was snubbed upon, wouldn't have been accepted in the grand world of high literature, and the same verdicts fell on romance, science fiction or graphic novels. This literary bias mirrors an underlying class bias, a much bigger issue here in Belfast than in Switzerland. I have to say that my mum, a professional botanist herself, looked down on crime fiction wholeheartedly, though this had nothing to do with class snobbery but with her inability to read in a foreign language. Her command of English improved and it's widely accepted by now, that the best crime novels are written by working class writers and feature working class heroes with working class villains that chase each other in blue-collar towns and estates.

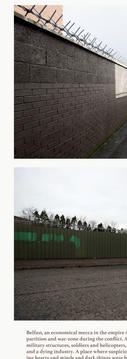

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

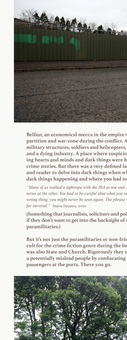

Until the early 1990s, many thrillers on Irish matters were written by non-Irish people characterising the Irish as the jolly ploughboy, the Irish rebel, the romantic gunman, the brutal and misguided terrorist. In prison for bombing the Brighton Hotel in 1984, Pat Magee wrote his PhD on the representation of Irish Republicans in Troubles fiction. Most striking, he found, was that

"Britain is rarely depicted as part of the problem, never mood, as republicans would argue, the problem. Various permutations of the formula reveal a blarney-spouting thug with a 'ferrety look' and 'bad teeth', a 'fat, red-faced gombeen with a rotten tooth and puffy botched skin'. In this murky light, the police are attributed a significance wholly from an ingrained bloodlust and is not the effect or symptom of profound political grievance."

It's much harder to explore and express what has happened by drawing from experience, talking about things that you know, feel, smell, fear, live through than about things you've read. Or watched on the news. And it's not always successful. But cliche is dangerous and turns quickly into banalities. It is important to contest prejudices and stereotypes by humanising the characters and correct misrepresentations for the sake of adequate understanding.

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

Belfast, an economical mecca in the empire turning provincial backwater after partition and war-zone during the conflict. A bleak, eerie, ghostly place, with military structures, soldiers and helicopters, eternal rain and fog, bomb sites and a dying industry. A place where suspicion, fear and violence were moulding hearts and minds and dark things were happening – a perfect location for crime stories. But there was a very defined lack of interest from editors, so writer and reader to delve into dark things where what you had outside your door were dark things happening and where you had to consider your word carefully.

"Many of us walked a tightrope with the IRA at one end, and the British Army and loyalist paramilitaries at the other. You had to be careful after what you said and wrote. Words could kill. If you said the wrong thing, you might never be seen again. The phrase whatever you say, say nothing was a mantra for survival." Anne Enright, 1995

(Something that journalists, solicitors and politicians still need to consider today, if they don't want to get into the backsight of officially disbanded but still existing paramilitaries.)

But it's not just the paramilitaries or non-Irish upper-class that made it difficult for the crime fiction genre during the best part of the last century. There was also State and Church. Rigorously they spread their protective wings over a potentially mislead people by confiscating immoral crime novels from ferry passengers at the ports. There you go.

© Sabine Tessmer, 2016

Over twenty years into the peace process, society based on US for 1st, based on Europe for 2nd, and based on Ireland for 3rd, is still struggling. Still a dysfunctional, ulcerous, idyllic far-overage is passed to the state. Writers obviously find more at ease to explore the violent past in a new imaginative form, navigate this potential minefield and unveiling the story of Belfast. With time and distance it's easier to tackle sensitive issues that haven't completely gone away. People have suffered, people live with trauma as a result. It's not something to make light-entertainment out of. And it's not something that a portion of Irish humour would shy away from. Something I learned at NOIRLAND, the crime fiction festival that in 2017 took place at the most bombed Hotel in Belfast – the EUROPA.

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

Adrian McKinty grew up in a Protestant housing estate during the Troubles but eventually moved to Australia, where, in order to write, he pulls down the shades and puts on a soundtrack of gutty rainfalls. In the author of the Sean Duffy thrillers, a series of books where the hero, a Catholic policeman in the 1980s is confronted not only with a civil war in the streets of Belfast, but with sectarian skirmishes from within his workspace and threats from the republican as well as the loyalist paramilitaries. During an interview with Martin Doyle, book editor of THE IRISH TIMES, Adrian pointed out how easy it was for him to create this character.

Martin Doyle:
Why did you always going to be a Catholic policeman?
Adrian McKinty:
Oh absolutely! I was going to put him up in my house where I was born and grew up. I was going to put him in the Divis Flats, which is a notorious housing estate in Belfast. I was going to put him in all these toughest-in-the-town! Well for of all, he's gotta be a Catholic. That's gonna really really rub them off. Second of all, he's gonna be a policeman, they're not gonna like that. A Catholic and a policeman, he's gonna have authority over them, there's gonna rich them off, so I'll be gonna make him a Protestant Bohemian. This middle-class guy, bohemian, he knows 'who the Velvet Underground are.'

During the 'Troubles' Catholics made up only around 40% of the police force. For Catholics, it was a dangerous career move, not only because policing in a war zone IS dangerous, but because it wasn't in the IRA's ethos to take part in protecting a state that in their view – and in the view of about a third of its population – was illegitimate. As Sean Duffy in his GUN STREET GIRL ironically puts it,

"It certainly didn't help that I was a Catholic. A Catholic in Carrickfergus was bad enough, but a Catholic policeman? My life expectancy could be measured in hours."

Whilst this line really makes me laugh, the situation was in reality no laughter different, if not as harsh, not as obviously absurd anymore. The Royal Ulster Constabulary is now the Police Service of Northern Ireland and Catholics make up around 30% of the organisation. On the upper echelons Catholics (as well as women, but that's not a Belfast speciality) are a rare species.

The threat against Catholic police officers from dissident republicans, who didn't buy into the peace process, is still ongoing. In 2019, a bomb under constable Peadar Heffron's car exploded and left him with an amputated leg. The year after, constable Ronan Kerr was killed and in 2009, constable Stephen Carroll responded to an emergency alert where he was shot dead. In this specific case it's not so clear who really was behind the attacks. Two men are in prison, but the case is weak and talk of miscarriage of justice is loud.

© Sabine Tessmer, 2017

After the PSNI replaced the RUC in 2001, a 50/50 recruitment policy – one Catholic recruit for every one person from a Protestant or other background – was set in place, it ran until 2011. Today the numbers of Catholic recruits are falling dramatically and the call for a return to 50/50 comes not only from nationalist politicians, but from the Catholic Primate Eamon Martin himself. Another plan to push the numbers is to establish a Catholic Police Officers Guild to provide pastoral care for practising Roman Catholics in the police service. And by the way, with only a few more Catholics, the PSNI CAN might even survive.

Back in the days, local authors were told to place their stories in Glasgow or Liverpool. Nobody wanted to be reminded of Belfast, that desolate failure of a place that had lost its industry, its soul and its reason to be. Today it's a vibrant and inspiring city – in their view – societal and cultural backwater was. How an art let could meander through the darkness of a society pushed to the extreme, and explore it forensically. How a talented writer could turn horrific realities into suspense and entertainment without trivialise the actual event. Crime calls for a dark city full of lose and hopeless souls. Belfast lends itself to crime fiction.

© Sabine Tessmer, 2016

With the end of daily acts of sectarian violence and relative peace in the streets of Belfast, there is now space for dark writing.

Paul Burke, Nothing to Inclusive Irish Crime Fiction, The Troubles and The Last Crossing, 08/05/2020
Eleanore Devenney, Make Your Stand by the Dawn, 2018
Aaron Kelly, The Thriller and Northern Ireland since 1965, 2005
Adrian McKinty, Sean Duffy Interview
Adrian McKinty at NOIRLAND, 18/10/2019